Qualifications

Please describe your relevant analytical skills.

As one who majored in Modern European History at the Bachelor's (Rice University '65) and Master's (Cornell University '70) levels, I was trained in the ability to think analytically about political, economic and intellectual trends. As a high school teacher for 32 years, I taught courses in world and American history, government, economics, anthropology, geography and philosophy as a member of the Social Studies department; for good measure, I also taught math courses over the years, from Algebra to Pre-Calculus. All of these required analytical thinking (on the part of the teacher as well as of the students). I have always followed political events at the world, national, state and local levels; and as a retiree for eight years, I have had more time available for this than most people. I have also maintained a long term interest in demography and political geography.

Please describe your ability to be impartial.

I wish I could say that the same college training in which I developed analytic ability would be sufficient to guarantee that I had learned objectivity and impartiality; but I observe that most people, even at the highest levels of education, do not develop such abilities. Nonetheless, I would point out that my political values and opinions could not easily be predicted from my demographic categories (ethnic group, age, education, religious upbringing, income etc.). I believe that it is important not only that America as a country should choose to do the right things, but that it should arrive at its policies by democratic means, through an educated citizenry that fully participates in decision-making. I abhor the practice of gerrymandering and all attempts at voter suppression. I would like to see Austin moving forward in intelligent ways; but the City Council that makes the decisions should represent the input of as much of the population as possible. All ethnicities should have represented, to the extent that this is possible; and people in various parts of the city should also feel that they have input. I would prefer districts that have some diversity within them; one criticism of present national and state representative districts is that they have been drawn so that only a small fraction of them are competitive. I believe that this leads to ideological rigidity, ignoring all but core constituents, incumbent complacency and ultimately corruption.

Please describe your appreciation for the City of Austin's diverse demographics and geography.

In the early 2000s my wife and I were seeking to relocate from the Philadelphia area, where I had spent my teaching career, looking for a community to retire. We chose Austin, of course, but we also took care to select a house that would be in the city, in Travis County and in the Austin school district, so that we would always be voting in a community that shared our values. Before that we chose to live in the school district where I taught, an integrated, diverse township in which our children had a quality education but were always part of a minority culture. We saw many of the same qualities writ large in the City of Austin; and certainly the diversity is something we prize. I would not do anything to weaken the diversity of voices in the city's governance.

Please provide any other information you wish to be considered during the selection of the most qualified applicants for the Commission.

Lest it be thought that I am a carpetbagger: I grew up in North Texas, and though I left the state for graduate school and for my teaching career, I retained both emotional and family ties to the state at all times. To me Austin represents the best of the state, and should provide leadership as to what Texas should become; good government is certainly a part of that.
